Why focus on domestic and gender-based violence?

An estimated one in three women in the EU have experienced physical violence in the last year. Some 3.7 million women have experienced sexual violence. Gender-based violence represents a major obstacle to the achievement of full equality between men and women. The effects of violence on a victim's health, both physical and psychological, can be severe. Despite efforts to counter such violence, it remains an extensive and widely under-reported human rights abuse, with young women and girls being particularly vulnerable.

What is supported?

Our support in the area of domestic and gender-based violence covers initiatives such as:

- Development of legislation, policies and strategies, including the development of effective protective measures
- Advocacy, awareness raising, and capacity building activities
- Development of effective and integrated response systems that bring together police, justice, health and civil society
- Training of professionals in close contact with victims and/or offenders
- Specialised support services for victims of gender-based violence and affected children, creating – when possible – partnerships between different levels of government and civil society
- Supporting shelters

Cooperation

The Council of Europe, the Istanbul Convention and prevalence data from the EU Agency for Fundamental Rights on the scale and nature of violence against women in Europe are important baselines in our work. The Norwegian Ministry of Justice and Public Security established a synergy network between donor entities, the Council of Europe and the Beneficiary States. To support partnerships and bilateral cooperation, the programmes have in addition the following Donor Programme Partners: The Norwegian National Police Directorate, the Norwegian Courts Administration and the Norwegian Directorate of Health. Project partnerships include the Icelandic Government Agency for Child Protection, and NGOs specialised in fighting domestic and gender-based violence.
